Repair Your Air Conditioner If:  $(\text{Cost of Repair}) \times (\text{Age of Old AC Unit in Years}) < (\text{Cost of Your New AC})$  What this means is, multiply the cost of your repair by the age of your old unit (in years). If the result is LESS than the cost of the new air conditioner that you want, then it is worth investing in a repair. If you have no idea what a replacement air conditioner will cost, then just use "\$5,000."

I bought this to get some idea of how to put refrigerant into a window air conditioner. Essentially I discovered that in my case, I didn't want to put refrigerant into the unit as it was crimped and soldered, and had no valves. Far easier and probably less expensive to buy a new unit rather than the tools I needed to perform the repair.
